Ask guests what they remember about a wedding at Bailey Wick Farm Wedding & Event Venue and a surprising number of them will mention the porch. The farm's wide covered porch has rocking chairs, a clear line of sight toward the Blue Ridge Mountains and enough room for guests to gather between the ceremony and the reception.

For couples from Daleville, Cloverdale and the wider Roanoke Valley, the porch solves a common problem. Cocktail hour often leaves older relatives standing on grass or squeezed into a hallway while photos are taken. At the farm in Fincastle, they can sit in a rocker in the shade, drink in hand, and watch the sun move toward the ridges while the wedding party finishes portraits.

Reviewers have described the sunset view from the farm as one of the highlights of their day. If you want to build your timeline around it, talk with the family about when sunset falls on your date and plan your ceremony to finish about an hour before. That leaves time for a few golden hour portraits and gets your guests onto the porch just as the sky turns.

The porch also gives you a ready backup if the forecast looks uncertain. A short ceremony can be held under cover, and the barn is right there for dinner and dancing. One couple who faced constant rain on their wedding day wrote that the day was still perfect, which says a lot about how well the spaces work together.

Making the Most of the Rockers

Small touches can turn the porch into one of the most comfortable parts of your day. Some couples add blankets over the backs of the rockers for fall weddings, set out lemonade or sweet tea for summer guests, or place a guest book on a side table so people can sign while they relax. Lanterns along the porch rail look lovely once the sun sets, and they help guests find their way between the porch, the barn and the fire pit later in the evening without the need for harsh overhead lighting.
