

When to Call a Plumber Versus DIY in Seattle WA Salish Plumbing Co

Seattle's active home improvement culture and the prevalence of older homes that need regular attention mean that many Ballard and North Seattle homeowners do a lot of their own maintenance. There are plumbing tasks that experienced DIYers can handle safely, and there are situations where calling a licensed plumber is not only the smarter choice but potentially required by Seattle code. Salish Plumbing Co is happy to advise honestly about which category a specific situation falls into. Replacing a toilet flapper, swapping a showerhead, or cleaning a slow bathroom drain with a hand snake are all tasks that most capable homeowners can complete safely without calling a plumber. Replacing a faucet or a toilet supply line is within reach for someone with basic mechanical aptitude and the right tools. These tasks do not require permits and carry minimal risk if done carefully.

Work that requires licensing and permits in Seattle includes water heater replacement (gas or electric), any work on gas lines, repiping of water supply lines, adding new drain and supply lines for a new fixture location, and sewer line repair or replacement. Beyond the legal requirement, these tasks carry real risk if done incorrectly: a gas connection made without proper tools and testing can leak, a water heater installed without proper venting can produce carbon monoxide, and a sewer lateral repair done without camera confirmation can fail in ways that are not visible until a backup occurs. For all of these situations, Salish Plumbing Co is the right call. Salish Plumbing Co | Shoreline, WA | (206) 867-0624
